I'm a driver and I'm expected to take work-related road safety seriously.

What's in it for me?

My employer's looking out for me.

My employer monitors what, why and how I drive. We're working together to keep me safe.

There is no fudging – I know where I stand

The company is much clearer about what it's doing and what it expects from me, which is great.

I feel valued and respected

The new policy makes me think and drive differently. It keeps me safe and makes me feel valued by my company. In return, I understand how important my role as a driver is in safeguarding my company.

I'm improving, learning and becoming safer

They're applying strict practices and procedures to me, my vehicle and my journey, encouraging me to drive safely. I'm acquiring new skills to improve my driving which is something I never thought I needed but it's surprising how much you can still learn. I think I've become a better driver and I'm proud of that.

Less stress – less risk

I know my car is properly maintained. My journeys are now sensible and I'm driving safer – not breaking my neck to get from one appointment to the next. I'm arriving relaxed and doing better and it's coming through in my figures.

I'm no longer getting it in the neck at home

My wife and family think it's great that the company is taking an interest in our welfare – and they're right. Less stress at home makes work easier and more productive.

How did all this come about?

Our MD rolled out the RiskMaster programme to manage work-related road safety. It's been put together by specialists who know what they're talking about. It's geared to saving money and saving lives.

Knowing the company really cares about my welfare makes me feel different.

It's a lot of pressure being on the road but having the company looking out for me is a real bonus.
